Description:

After interviewing and photographing over 100 nurses for her groundbreaking The American Nurse book and film, Carolyn Jones has spent another two years researching and interviewing nurses for her latest film, Defining Hope, a documentary that follows individuals through end-of-life decisions and choices. Our aging population and our scientific advances and capabilities clash with current healthcare challenges, including quality and costs. Nurses and other healthcare professionals support individuals making life-altering decisions on a daily basis. This movie opens our thoughts and hearts to identifying and changing a culture where dying is not an accepted societal norm. What makes life worth living for you? How do you as a nurse and an individual define hope?
